Painting is learning to see. Often, we paint what we think we see because we all have preconceived notions of what something looks like. However, to really paint what you see, you must break down everything you are looking at into just abstract shapes. In this Plein Air workshop, Aline will do a demonstration every day and emphasize the understanding of design and color in terms of temperature, intensity and value while translating those ideas into the technique of painting. She gives a lot of individual attention to each student throughout the day as well.

Aline is known for her vivid use of color. She is a signature member of the Oil Painters of America as well as the American Impressionist Society. She has been a presenter at the Plein Air Convention and teaches workshops throughout the country.
